A On Monday evening, Noam opened the school website on his family's computer. His class had already planned a book sale for a community library. He wanted to make friends with Eitan, the new boy, so he asked him to help with the display. Eitan's answer appeared a minute later: “Do it yourself.” Noam read the three words again. They sounded like an order. “He thinks he is better than me,” Noam told his brother. He felt his face grow hot. Instead of asking for an explanation, he started writing an angry answer, then stopped. Tomorrow, he decided, he would cancel their work together.

B The next morning, Noam put the books on the table alone. His main concern was the welcome sign. The letters were uneven, and the table looked empty. When Eitan approached him with a large blue bag, Noam turned away. “You don't need to help,” he said. “I can see that you don't want to.” Eitan put down the bag. “What about the rest of my message?” he asked. Noam showed him the screen. Eitan looked surprised. “The second part is missing! I wrote, ‘Do it yourself for now. My little brother needs help. I can bring the stand tomorrow.’”

C From his bag, Eitan took out a wooden stand. There was blue paint on his fingers. He and his father had finished making it late the night before. Suddenly, Noam understood why Eitan had answered so quickly. “I have never felt so embarrassed about assuming the worst,” Noam said. “But I didn't know for sure.” “My first words were unfriendly,” Eitan replied. “I agree. I have learned that explaining things clearly matters.” For a moment, neither boy spoke. Then Noam moved the books, and Eitan placed the stand in the middle. The welcome sign fitted perfectly.

D Noam still remembered the hurt he felt. A missing sentence did not immediately make that feeling disappear. However, the stand was evidence that Eitan cared about their project. “Helping your brother was important, and I appreciate your coming today,” Noam said. That afternoon, they wrote a short rule for their next project: “If a message sounds strange, ask before you assume.” In other words, three words do not always tell the whole story. As the first visitors arrived, Eitan stood behind the table. Noam moved his own chair beside him. “This one is yours,” he said. Eitan sat down, and they opened the first box together.
