MORE THAN AN OLD SCHOOL BAG

I Visitors to the Westford Museum usually expect to see objects behind glass. Last summer, however, they found an empty display case near the entrance. Nothing had been stolen, and the museum had not run out of things to show. Instead, the empty space was an invitation. The museum wanted local residents to suggest an everyday object for a new exhibition about life in the town. Its aim was to include experiences that were missing from its existing collections.

II Residents could suggest anything from a kitchen tool to a bus ticket. They first had to send a photograph and a short description explaining where the object came from and why it mattered to them. These details helped the museum team understand the story behind each suggestion. People did not need to bring the object to the museum unless the team contacted them. This made it possible to consider objects that were still being used at home.

III Choosing an object was more difficult than the team had expected. Some residents assumed that the oldest or most expensive item would win. However, the team was looking for something that could reveal an interesting part of everyday life. A beautiful silver watch was not selected because very little was known about its owner. A worn school bag attracted more attention because it had belonged to three generations of the same family, who had all attended the local school.

IV Sixteen-year-old Daniel suggested the bag after finding it in his grandmother's cupboard. He originally hoped that the museum would help him discover when it had been made. While preparing his description, however, he interviewed several relatives and learned about their school days. The museum could not establish the bag's exact age, but Daniel felt that the conversations had been worthwhile. He had discovered that an ordinary object could encourage people to share memories they had never discussed with him before.

V The bag was eventually chosen, together with photographs and memories provided by Daniel's family. Nevertheless, the museum team recognized a limitation: one family's experience could not represent everyone in Westford. They therefore invited visitors to add their own school memories to a noticeboard beside the display. The team is also considering a similar exhibition about working life. No date has been set, since staff must first review what they learned from the school exhibition.
